

"Logically Speaking"

It just seems logical to me, that if people are so bent on celebrating the birth of Jesus Christ at this time of year, without any instruction or command or example from God's word, then they ought to be just as willing to celebrate His death, burial and resurrection every first day of the week, especially since God did give us instruction and commands and examples regarding such.

It also seems logical to me, that if people don't like to sing along with the congregation during worship services, then why would they want to go to heaven? There's going to be lots of singing there according to God's word. Or is it that heaven is just the better of two alternatives for eternity?

While I'm being logical, I often wonder why the denominations don't just all get together on Sundays and worship in the same place at the same time, that is as long as one church is as good as another.

When some asks, "Why is it wrong to play instruments in worship? They did it in David's day and God was fine with it" I wonder why the same folks don't want to also burn animal sacrifices on an altar. They did it in David's day and God was fine with that too.

Lots of folks don't seem to want to be bothered with Bible classes on Sunday mornings or Wednesday evenings. But yet, they don't know the Bible well or even where to find certain passages of Scripture when they need it. I don't say that to be mean, but doesn't it just makes sense that if we don't know about something, the only way to remedy that is to study? How else are we going to learn what we don't know, providing of course that we even want to know in the first place.

I believe that a lot of folks believe that "good people" will go to heaven right along with the "churchy" people. But, logically speaking, if that were true, wouldn't it be grossly unfair for all the Christians that obey God's word, do their best to be faithful to His commands, and study God's word diligently? What a cruel joke that would be!

I also believe, that logically speaking, God has provided for us all that He intended for us to know regarding all of these subjects and topics and more. What folks must do to be found pleasing in his sight, He has told us. It is our duty and responsibility to do just that.... to do what pleases God. Anything else can only result in eternal destruction.
